SHOWS NEED OF CITY PLANNING

Proper Distribution of Population Necessary for Public Health. As a war measure, every civilized country in the world is making conscientious efforts to promote the health of its people. If only to save them for the ranks of active fighting, a high standard of public health is an asset to any nation.

Since there is a marked tendency toward concentration of population in cities and towns, the proper planning of these centers of activity becomes a matter of supreme importance, says Dean E. J. McCaustland of the University of Missouri. Laying out of streets, placing a limit on the heights of buildings and providing sufficient open areas and parks, all have a direct bearing on the health as well as the comfort of citizens. City planning, therefore, appears to have been given a special impetus during the last two years. Practically all the problems met with are engineering problems and these are being given special attention at the University of Missouri and at engineering schools throughout the country. After the war is over the general spirit of reconstruction will no doubt operate to bring about many improvements in the older methods or lack of methods in city planning and building.
